Kraków, the only large historic city within Poland's current borders to have survived the tragedy of the Second World War physically unscathed and is a symbol of continuity and endurance. One of the signs of its capacity for the creation of culture is that it is often referred to as Poland's cultural capital and the main objective of its 2000 ECoC program was to make the city more internationally recognizable. With a very different historic trajectory, Wrocław was not only terribly destroyed in 1945 but it also became the largest European city which, as a result of WWII, replaced its entire population over a 40-year period. The Wrocław European Capital of Culture 2016 focused on and revolved around the co-creation of culture with local citizens. The lecture investigates the politics and economics of the ECoC event and it will present how its goals were related to and embedded within the built heritage of these cities during the celebration year itself as well as the effects in the years since.
